We would be glad to hear it from you.Toronto's daily car commute is second only to New York City's in terms of how difficult it can be. The good news is that trips like this can be made much more easily with the addition of Toronto's newest bike lanes, on the Jarvis Street stretch of the Gardiner, which were officially opened on Thursday morning. These new bike lanes will make the city's north end much more bike friendly. The new lanes are 8.5 metres wide, and three lanes of traffic were eliminated in order to make room for the lanes. The lanes are expected to attract 100,000 to 150,000 more people to ride bikes in the city, according to a staff report on the project. Both lanes are separated from traffic by a thin white line. A clearly marked bike path crosses the roadway. The new bike lanes are the third phase of a much larger two-year project to build a dedicated cycle track along Jarvis Street. (City of Toronto) The new Jarvis lanes represent the third phase of a much larger two-year project to build a dedicated cycle track along Jarvis Street, and are part of an ongoing plan to improve cycling infrastructure in the city. As part of the overall plan, the city has built dedicated lanes along other roads like Yonge Street and Finch Avenue, which are also undergoing construction. "As always, when we add more street space for cyclists, we see more people riding. What is impressive is that we've seen more people on bikes than ever before in Toronto," said Coun. Joe Cressy, who represents Ward 20 (Trinity-Spadina). The majority of the cycling infrastructure in Toronto is in place, but Cressy said there are still more bike lanes to be added to the city. He said the city is still in need of more lanes along Finch Avenue East, at Kennedy Road, and there are plans to install them.Lantana crocata Lantana crocata is a species of flowering plant in the verbena family (Verbenaceae).
